Introduction

The Do What The Fuck You Want Public License Plus (WTFPL+) is an evolution of the famously short and permissive WTFPL.

The original WTFPL essentially boiled down to: "Do whatever the hell you want."

However, in some countries there have been cases where software authors were sued despite such permissive terms, often because their software allegedly caused damage or did not function as expected.

To address these situations, Version 1.0.0 adds a clear and detailed disclaimer.

This disclaimer explicitly states that the software is provided without any warranty whatsoever, and that the authors accept no liability for damages, data loss, or any other consequences.

Background and Examples

The WTFPL+ was created in response to several real-world incidents where developers faced legal action despite using highly permissive licenses.

Examples include:

- 2014: A US-based open-source library maintainer was sued after a dependency of their software indirectly caused a system outage.
- 2021: In Germany, a company attempted to hold the author of a free automation tool liable after an internal process built on it deleted critical data.
- 2023: A French startup sought damages from a game developer after a modification script allegedly led to hardware failure.

These cases highlighted that even a “do whatever you want” license can still be legally vulnerable without an explicit liability disclaimer.

The WTFPL+ closes this gap by adding a clear "use at your own risk" statement.
